If I could have lunch with anyone, it would be...

If given the opportunity to have lunch with anyone, without restraint, I would like to enjoy my meal with three personalities. The first would be Living Tribunal, a Marvel Comic entity who is the cosmic manager of the multiverse in the comic books, the character who is depicted as the final judgment with three faces representing equity, revenge, and necessity respectively. My second choice would be Albert Einstein, one of the many geniuses that have worked on the Theory of Relativity and quantum physics. My other option would be one of the Renaissance artist and scientist, Leonardo Da Vinci, the man that came up with inventions and theories far beyond his time.

The main reason I would choose these three characters would be because it would be fascinating to have a discussion on the ideas of the multiverse with the Living Tribunal, who would be able to explain the complexity of ideas of both Einstein and Da Vinci. I would be curious to know the physics and possibly the metaphysics, behind the concept of multiple variations of reality existing all at once. It would also be interesting to hear the perspectives of men of science and art from different periods of history and to find out how they would explain it with the knowledge they already had, as well as how it would change the theories they had developed and worked on in their own time.

The other reason that these three individuals would be interesting to have lunch with would be to have the ethical discussion around the control of a multiverse by one being, although having separate “personalities.” It would be interesting to discuss the ethical dilemma around who should be allowed to decide on the fate of living beings or the planet, especially considering the culture and the eras Einstein and Da Vinci lived in. I think they would have interesting insights and opinions on the topic of a multiverse. I think this would definitely turn out to be a very interesting and intellectual lunch.
